"Reseña del editor Anne Tyng (born 1920) explores the potentials of geometry through her architectural and teaching practices. Since the 1950s, when she worked closely with Louis Kahn and independently pioneered space-frame construction, Tyng has applied natural and numeric systems to built forms on all scales, from urban plans to domestic spaces. She believes that geometry is a metaphor for thought and the creative process--as a spatial demonstration of how the mind generates associations through the combination of pattern and chance. This volume documents a new project by the visionary architect and theorist. Commissioned by the Institute of Contemporary Art Philadelphia, Tyng has created an installation-scale model that realizes the ambition of all of her work: to inhabit geometry. Exploring her life-long fascination with the Platonic solids, the book also features related models and documentation of past projects, including Tyng and Kahn's never-built design for City Tower in Philadelphia (1952-1956)."

one of the themes visible throughout several projects of the late 1940s 50s and 60s is the use of frameworks clusters or cells to organize space. Room size models of platonic solids by architect anne tyng are featured in an upcoming exhibition entitled inhabiting geometry tyng's research on geometry led her to develop a theory of the hierarchies of symmetry or symmetries within symmetries and these are represented in the exhibition by large wooden platonic solids equilateral and equiangular polyhedra the tetrahedron cube. Visionary architect and theorist anne tyng has designed a gallery scale model that embodies her thinking about geometry over the last half century this installation built largely from luan plywood realizes the ambition of all her work to inhabit geometry since the 1950s when she worked closely with louis i kahn and independently pioneered habitable space frame architecture tyng.
